Excerpt: . . . of a finger, and could only very feebly make acknowledgment of encouraging and endearing words. I certainly did not think that any good could come of sending at once, as of course we did, for the nearest vet. In response to the summons there presently arrived an old unkempt dishevelled man seemingly somewhat cracked, and seemingly also somewhat gone in liquor. But his art had become a second nature, and he clearly knew all that a man may know about cats. He had a HEREDITY 83 very pleasant voice, and Toots perked up a very little at hearing it. Then he proceeded secundum artem to stroke the cat, which far from resisting, actually purred in a weak way. Then this excellent practitioner proceeded to bandage up the now unresisting Toots comfortably, persuaded him to take a mouthful of milk and so left him. He...
